RAMBLER IN FRANCE.
"Errant" Among the Ancient Cathedrals.

The Cave Dwellers.
A Jaunt on Foot Over a Beautiful Country.

(Correspondence of the Herald.)

NANTES, FRANCE, April 12, 1880.
Greatness consists not so much in grandeur as in reality. The greatest of all things is truth, it being most rare. Shakespeare was the greatest of men, because he told more truths than any before or since; and he told them in a way that made them true.

The world is a stage, and many men in their time play many parts. The part of most men, and women, too, is to play the fool, and how well they are adapted to it by instinct and by education, I have never known.

A week ago I quitted Paris to visit the western and southern parts of France, portions not frequented much by tourists, and hence offering some genuine attraction to the ordinary tourist. Paris was rejoicing in the advent of spring, and her new robes of green. The day was alternately pleasant and disagreeable; now rain, now sunshine, now thunder, with darkness occasionally illuminated by lightning, and succeeding to this was the song of birds and the joy of spring.

Paris never showed to better advantage than that day. Everywhere I felt that spring had come, and in its train had brought renewed happiness and prospects for a prosperous summer. The country around was charming, and seemed to revel in the abundance of its own fruitfulness.

From every side was seen the Arc de Triomphe de l'Etoile, rearing itself high above everything. It was the first and the last thing seen, and soon Paris had faded from sight. My destination was Chartres; my object, to see the cathedral.

Chartres is a quiet and a quaint old town, lying mid rolling hills and dwelling in solitude. Its only claim to notoriety is its cathedral; but yet to anyone who will spend his time through its narrow and crooked streets, wander along the stream, bordered with tall and majestic trees, which flows at the foot of the hill, will find the picturesque at every turn. The old town is built on a hill, and above rises majestically the cathedral, a most fitting object to which the town may look up and pray homage and reverence. The only gate to the town remaining is Port Guillaume, the very ideal of a beautiful entrance. On either side rises a tower, surmounted with battlements. In front flows a deep and broad stream, the gate only reached over a bridge supported on arches. Along the banks of the stream, by the side of the cathedral, are the ruins of a castle, the remains of a fine old town, and the site of a great battle.
